Local artisans present their wares for sale ahead of the holidays at the NMCH

By ROB BURGESS Wabash Plain Dealer Editor

On Tuesday, the North Manchester Center for History (NMCH) opened its final event of the year, "Market @ the Museum," during which area artisans are selling their wares through Saturday, Dec. 12 at 122 E. Main St., North Manchester.

Laura Rager, director, said she was worried about attendance being light, but those fears were soon put to rest as they started the day.

"We had two cars waiting at the doors this morning when we opened at 10," said Rager. "I really thought this being a Tuesday, this would kind of a soft opening. That was fun."

Peg Herendeen said she had been making and selling baskets at various locations for around 30 years.

Local, state officials look back at election challenges

Virus caused voting centers to move away from long-term care facilities

By ROB BURGESS Wabash Plain Dealer Editor

On Tuesday, Lori Draper, Wabash County clerk, said her office was busy taking stock of their successes and challenges during this year's general election.

Changing locations during a high-turnout election

Unlike previous elections, long-term care facilities were not able to be used as voting centers due to safety concerns over COVID-19.

Draper said these changes in locations and times, both for Election Day and in-person early voting, were chal-

"I feel the change of voting centers worked well," said Draper. "The greatest issue I had was getting the word out to the voters about the changes. They were used to voting at certain locations on certain days and it has been difficult this year because we had to change on a federal election year when a lot more voters vote."

Indeed, turnout both locally and statewide was high this year. Last month, Draper said in Wabash County, voter turnout was 69.2 percent. And on Nov. 24, Secretary of State Connie Lawson announced that 65 percent or 3,068,542 of Indiana's 4.7 million registered voters cast a vote in the Nov. 3 General Election. In 2016 and 2012, voter turnout was at 58 percent. In 2008, 62 percent of registered Hoosiers voted in the General Election. This was a record-setting year, with 3,068,578 Hoosiers casting a ballot, more than in 2008, 2012 or 2016.

Farmer sentiment in United States reaches record high

After six months of below-average commodity prices, a steady rebound in the price of soybeans and corn helped fuel a rally in farmer's rounding area were forced to dump outlook across the agriculture in- milk. dustry.

The Group Ag Economy Barometer them when you think about the reached a record-high point in its most recent report, which gauges farmer sentiment in a national survey. The analysis of October's data found that the recent rise in prices, combined with government program payments stemming from the Coronavirus Food Assistance Program, were the primary drivers of increased optimism, according to Purdue University researchers.

Purdue Extension Educator Ed Farris said these reports of improved feelings regarding current and future expectations holds true for farmers in the north-central Indiana region. Farris said a good harvest season and better-than-expected yields contributed to the local optimism.

"There were some really challenging times in ag this past year, so anything that can help stability – like these increased prices for corn and soybeans - is a benefit."

The second-highest barometer reading on record was recorded helped with harvest, Farris says, before the pandemic hit, but the indices dropped sharply once lockdowns went into place.

"Since bottoming out this summer, the ag economy has rebounded sharply, and the dramatic improvement in sentiment reflects the turnaround in the farm income picture," James Mintert, the barometer's principal investigator and director of Purdue University's Center for Commercial Agriculture, said, according to a Purdue University press release.

"Overall there were better yields than what farmers expected in most areas, but again there are definitely places where we saw some lower yields for both corn and soybeans," Farris said regarding conditions in northern Indiana, where some farmers experienced isolated dry spells. harvest went well. "Harvest progress is going along great though.'

The continued dry conditions have since too much rain can stop farmers from getting into their fields. However, the heavy and often sporadic rains in the north-central parts of Indiana caused some local farmers to have reduced pollination for corn crops. Spotty reports of dry spells in the area during active growing days lowered crop conditions and yields north of Indiana, according to USDA reports, but areas in southern Indiana saw better harvest quality.

'In some areas of the state, they Minert's comments relate to the had some of the best yields they've ever had or close to it. I won't say that in this area, some were better fall. The prices have continued to than average but there was some

Crop insurance does help rain patterns for the Wabash River Valley region, but he said the dryer-than-normal conditions allowed the crops to dry out more than last year. He said some of the corn and soybean crops had less-than-desired levels of moisture at harvest, according to reports from a grain elevator in Urbana, but overall he said

'We definitely had spotty rain too, so there were some fields that did great, there were some fields that didn't do so great," Schortgen said. "All in all considering what rains we did get or lack thereof in August, it did turn out just about as good as it could have for how dry it was later in the season."

With record-breaking rainfall totals during the first half of 2019, and extreme swings in weather during both planting and harvesting seasons, according to National Weather Service of Northern Indiana reports, Farris said farmers are learning to deal with erratic weather.

We have definitely noticed some extremes in weather conditions and that does have farmers taking notice," he said. "That is why crop insurance is so important in today's world if you are growing corn and

The Trump administration authorized two federal assistance programs this year to offset losses incurred by the pandemic and decreased commodity markets caused by the ongoing trade war with China. Those payments factored into the current condition optimism, according to Purdue, and Farris said the late rebound in prices puts Hoosier farmers in a better position than they were expecting earlier this year when outlook was more pessi-

"Now they are able to at least maybe break even instead of going in the hole because of these better prices," Farris said.

With better profit margins, Farris said farmers are watching out for possible higher cash rental contracts in the future, but he said overall Hoosier farmers are looking forward to next year while remaining

"There is a little bit more optimism when thinking ahead about local agriculture for growing corn and soybeans for next year, but we saw some pretty low profits for the livestock industry," Farris said.

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) The number of COVID-19 deaths in Indiana (1,416 people) nearly doubled in November, and the state on Tuesday reported that coronavirus-related hospitalizations remain at their highest point during the pandemic.

Gov. Eric Holcomb on Tuesday also signed an extension of the state's public health emergency through Dec. 31, a step under which he has issued the statewide mask order and limits on crowd sizes. Officials in a northern Indiana county hit by a surge in cases approved allowing fines against businesses for violating virus precaution measures over the objections of a Republi-

Trust issues are remnants of past toxic relationships

DEAR ABBY: Marriage is considered to be imperative in my religion and culture. I'm 29 and still not married. I have commitment and trust issues with guys. I have been in only three relationships entire my life.

Every time things are going well, I tend to self-sabotage and make excuses to push the guy away. I start arguments for no reason or create problems or issues that I fabricate out of thin air. I think it has a lot to do with the fact that my past relationships were toxic and tumultuous. They cheaters and liars.

I have carried that baggage into my relationship with my new partner by not believing a lot of the things he says. For example, I doubt his feelings for me. When things are going smoothly between us, I always take five or 10 steps back. It isn't fair that I put him through the wringer, but I don't know any other way. How can I get past this continuous issue? – Problem Trusting In California

DEAR PROBLEM TRUST- SUDOKU ING: The most effective way to do that would be to talk about this destructive pattern with a licensed mental health adviser. If you do, it may help you rid yourself of the "baggage" you are carrying, understand why you chose the men you did before, and make it easier to evaluate any new relationships that start to develop.

DEAR ABBY: I have known my friend "Matt" for more than 20 years. We've been close for most of those Matt is gay, and early in our friendship, we had a mutual friend, "Gary," who used a gay epithet often, even though he knew Matt is gay. It hurt Matt, but he wasn't comfortable speaking to Gary about it, so I did. Gary not only apologized to Matt but to this day (some 18 years later), I haven't heard Gary say that word in our company.

Recently, Matt has started using the N-word. I have told him that not only is it disgusting and offensive, but I compared it to the situation with Gary. Matt laughed it off and continues to use the word with no regard for me. I have started spending less time with him because of it because I don't want him to think I condone his racist language. Is it time to sever ties with Matt? -Disappointed In Maryland

DEAR DISAPPOINTED: I think so. The next time Matt uses the N-word, make clear to him that if you ever hear it from him again, your friendship will be OVER. And then follow through.

DEAR ABBY: I feel horrible about my "first time." It was with my boyfriend, and it happened in the back seat of his car. I had always dreamed of my first time being special, but after realizing we didn't have many options, we decided the car was fine. Now I feel ashamed and guilty. Can you advise me? - Not Like I Imagined In Texas DEAR NOT: I will try.

When did your first time happen? Last weekend? Last month? Last year? Whenever it was, it is in the past. Experience teaches us what works for us and what doesn't. Learn from it, but don't preoccupy yourself with regret over something you can't

What the U.S. Supreme Court got wrong about COVID-19 restrictions

The unsigned opinion by the nation's highest court got it wrong, insisting that restrictions placed on religious gatherings imposed by Gov. Cuomo in New York's COVID-19 hotspots must be nullified, for they violate the First Amendment

The dissent by the Bronx's Sonia Sotomayor got it right. The rules, capping gatherings at 10 people or less, are actually more generous for faith-based institutions than for any other type: "New York treats houses of worship far more favorably than

Earth can that be an offense to the guaranteed freedom to exercise religion? The majority has no answer.

Nor do they have a compelling reply to Chief Justice John Roberts' dissent, which points out that since churches and synagogues filed their challenges to New York's rules, the ground shifted. "None of the houses of worship identified in the applications is now subject to any fixed numerical restrictions. ... The Governor might reinstate the restrictions.

their secular comparators." How on But he also might not. And it is a significant matter to override determinations made by public health officials concerning what is necessary for public safety in the midst of a deadly pandemic."

In other words, there was no need to tie the hands of officials who are seeking to save lives in the midst of a public health crisis.

But what's done is done. New York is no longer allowed to count to 10 in synagogues and churches. Justices Amy Coney Barrett, Neil Gorsuch, Brett Kavanaugh, Samuel Alito and Clarence Thomas make five, and that's enough. In these United States, there's no higher authority on what is legal and constitutional.

Going forward, Cuomo must impose restrictions on religious services - and all others - keyed to the size of the given institution, similar to the way indoor dining is regulated. If lives are lost, chalk it up to a bad interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause.

Regional divergence and local taxes

In the century after the Civil War, the USA went through a long period of regional convergence. This simply means that as our standard of living grew, poorer places generally grew faster than richer places. This caused states and cities to "converge" towards one another at a time when our overall standard of living grew more than five-fold. By the 1970s the trend of convergence slowed appreciably, and by the 1990s reversed. Over the past three or so decades, rich places have grown more quickly, while poor places grew more slowly.

Population flows exacerbate these trends. Rich places tend to attract more people, while poorer places shed them. This results in some stark geographic anomalies. For example, Columbus, Ohio has captured 130 percent of Ohio's population growth in the 21st Century, while Indianapolis captured 120 percent of all Indiana's job growth. In recent decades, nearly all large urban places thrived, while smaller cities and rural places mostly stagnated.

Unsurprisingly, decades of these patterns cause unease and even resentment among many residents. There are several good studies tying this divergence to growing political discontent.

Just last week, mayors of seven Midwestern cities called for a domestic Marshall Plan to invest in their cities. They invoked the memory of America's large commitment to rebuilding Europe after World War II.

Their argument focused mostly on federal investment in clean energy technologies and urban infrastructure as a means for revitalizing cities. Unfortunately, the gist of this argument is that such investments would boost primarily factory and construction employment. While I think it is time to have a frank discussion about place-based economic policies, this particular argument has two fatal weaknesses.

First, the federal government heavily subsidizes poor places and people already. Federal tax dollars are disproportionately collected in affluent cities and distributed disproportionately to poor places.

While most of those tax dollars flow to individuals, not local governments, the notion that poor cities and rural areas are not getting their share of government spending is simply false. It is the other way around. Rich places receive far fewer tax dollars per person from federal taxes than do poor places. Moreover, within states, rich counties subsidize poor counties through state tax systems.

Again, it would be wise to review the spending priorities to poor places. But, taxpayers in rich cities also tax themselves more heavily than do smaller cities and rural places. To ask them to fork over even more money to places unwilling to raise their own revenues seems to me like a political dead end.

The second, bigger problem confronting the idea of a domestic Marshall Plan is that what ails cities and rural places has almost nothing to do with private sector capital investment. The problem is more fundamental. Declining cities and struggling rural places almost always have two overwhelming problems: Their educational attainment is too low to attract the types of jobs that will grow in the 21st Century, and the quality of their public services is too low to attract new households. This is a tough thing for most people to hear about their community, yet it is inevitably true. As an exercise, I have my undergraduate students build a predictive algorithm of a county's population growth using only educational attainment. They can do so with about 90 percent accuracy, and that gets at the heart of why the nation is experiencing regional divergence. Educational attainment is the strongest causal factor in regional economic growth. A century ago, workers enjoyed a wage premium by moving to a city with good transportation networks and a cheap energy source. Those factors dictated the strength of cities. Today, educated workers enjoy a wage premium by working closely with other educated workers. In the 21st Century economy, education and skills have replaced electricity, railroads and canals as the prime contributors of city growth.

There is a small chance that federal place-based economic policies can help smaller cities and rural places do better, but it is no more than a small chance. Federal spending might improve roads or sewage systems, extend broadband or help subsidize more reliable electricity. All of these are helpful, but they aren't the keys to revitalizing a Rust Belt city or aging factory town.

The real policy challenges remain at the state and local level. The federal government isn't going to address the fundamental weaknesses that keep some places poor while other thrive. Moreover, most people wouldn't want them to. The building blocks to better educational attainment happen in school board meetings and in statehouse votes, not in Congress. Places that do well recognize this, and places that do not will continue to lose population and relevance. That leads me to my final point. Recall that more affluent cities typically tax themselves more heavily than other places. There's a reason for this, and it reinforces the divergence between rich and poor places. Over time, household preferences change, and in recent decades school quality and neighborhood amenities have become more attractive. These attributes seem especially attractive to mobile households with educated workers and children. In short, the type of families that communities wish to attract. They also cost money.

The implication is that places that tax themselves more heavily to provide better schools and neighborhoods will capture most of the population growth. These are state and municipal governments who seek to compete for people on the basis of value. In contrast, many state and municipal governments focus more heavily on lower tax rates. These communities compete on price, not value. There may have been a time when being a low-price community was a successful strategy, but that time has long since passed. The economic forces that led to that change show no signs of abating, and successful cities have already figured that out.

Michael J. Hicks, PhD, is the director of the Center for Business and Economic Research at Ball State University. Hicks earned doctoral and master's degrees in economics from the University of Tennessee. He has authored two books and more than 60 scholarly works focusing on state and local public policy, including tax and expenditure policy and the impact of Wal-Mart on local economies.

What next for Trump's legal team?

The Trump campaign's top lawyers – Jenna Ellis, Rudy Giuliani, Sidney Powell – went into last weekend on the offensive. On Thursday, they held a news conference vowing to prove the existence of a far-ranging conspiracy to defeat the president. They were pressing a case alleging unfair voting practices in Pennsylvania. They were predicting victory.

By Sunday night, everything had

York

A judge threw out the Pennsylvania case. Then, amid widespread skepticism, Powell, the author of a theory that voting machines had changed millions of Trump votes into Biden votes, was booted from the team, leaving an First, Pennsylvania. No one should be surprised that Trump lost. The suit was against the Pennsylvania secretary of state, Kathy Boockvar, and seven individual counties.

It relied on two plaintiffs – two Pennsylvania men who said their mail-in ballots had been canceled for technical reasons, and they were not given a chance to

The judge agreed that the two men had suffered what is called an "injury in fact" - that is, their votes had not counted. But the problem was, neither man lived in any of the seven counties the Trump campaign named as defendants in the case. So none of the defendant counties had anything to do with the ballots in question. In addition, the suit did not tie the plaintiffs' situation to Boockvar. So none of the defendants had anything to do with the plaintiffs' complaints.

Nevertheless, the Trump campaign had sought to stop certification of Pennsylvania's results, set for Tuesday of this week. Roughly 6.9 million people voted in the state, with Joe Biden winning by 81,000 votes. There was no way the judge was going to do that, based on two voters in a case in which the Trump campaign didn't even sue the right counties. So on Saturday night, the judge threw it out. The Trump campaign will appeal.

But that wasn't the worst of it. On Thursday, Powell had alleged that there was an international conspiracy, fueled by "the massive influence of Communist money through Venezuela, Cuba and likely China," to overturn a Trump victory in the election. She alleged that the Dominion voting system and Smartmatic software, originally developed for Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chavez, had flipped hundreds of thousands or even millions of votes for Donald Trump to Joe Biden. She said that she would prove Trump "won by a landslide."

When journalists, notably Fox News' Tucker Carlson, asked Powell to provide some evidence to back up her charge, she refused. That led to a weird divide among some Trump supporters. Journalists questioned Powell's case, while some supporters attacked the journalists, saying Powell had the evidence but had no obligation to reveal it to the public. It would all come out in court, they said.

Then Powell went even further. On Friday night, she appeared on Newsmax, where she alleged that the Republican governor of Georgia, Brian Kemp, and the Republican secretary of state, Brad Raffensperger, were "in on the Dominion scam." She said Kemp and Raffensperger had accepted payoffs as part of the Powell finally went too far. She was accusing Georgia's top officials of bribery, but would not offer any evidence other than she had "been told" there was evidence. Within 24 hours, the Trump legal team sent out this brief press release: "Sidney Powell is practicing law on her own. She is not a member of the Trump legal team. She is also not a lawyer for the president in his personal capacity."

Powell was out, although she can certainly continue to act on her own, as another pro-Trump lawyer, Georgia's Lin Wood, is doing. But where that leaves her theory and vow to "blow up" Georgia is unclear.

Speaking of Georgia, Powell's antics on behalf of the president's team threatened to roil and divide Republicans in the state that is vitally important to the GOP right now. Georgia means everything. Its two Senate runoff races on Jan. 5 will determine who will control the Senate in the first two years of the Biden presidency. If Republicans control the Senate, they can stop Biden's agenda cold and, in the process, preserve some of Trump's legacy. If Democrats win the Senate, with their narrow control of the House, there are almost no limits on what they can do.

So it was politically ill-advised – some would say crazy - to seek to "blow up" Georgia. The goal for Republicans is to win Georgia. They will not do that by accusing the state's Republican governor, who is a strong supporter of the president, of corruption. They will not do that by alleging that hundreds of thousands of Georgians had their votes secretly changed by software from Hugo Chavez's Venezuela. Instead, they will win Georgia by campaigning there and by supporting the two Republican senators, David Perdue and Kelly Loeffler, who are running. It appears the White House might have finally figured that out.

"She's helping us monitor the stations and helping with sales and stuff like that," said Rager. "The idea wasn't for us to incur a lot of expense doing this, it was more of an outreach to people in the community. And it's also a great chance to visit with some of our artists because Peg is part of our regular gift Rager, laughing. shop, so this is an opportunity for her to expand what she's showing."

Herendeen showed off her booth, which included several intricately designed woven baskets. She said it depended on the style of basket how long each would take, which 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesdays could mean anywhere from seven to 10 hours of work.

Holy Communion for Biden? Issue divides bishops

While doing groundwork for the pivotal South Carolina primary, Democrat Joe Biden went to a local church to do what he does on Sundays go to Mass.

What happened next made headlines, raising an issue that looms over the president-elect's personal and political lives. The priest at St. Anthony's Catholic Church in Florence declined to give Biden communion.

Holy Communion signifies we are one with God, each other and the Church. Our actions should reflect that," said Father Rev. Robert E. Morey, in a press statement. "Any public figure who advocates for abortion places himself or herself outside of Church teaching. As a priest, it is my responsibility to minister to those souls entrusted to my care."

The priest, a former attorney with the Environmental Protection Agency, ended by saying: "I will keep Mr. Biden in my prayers."

Biden told MSNBC: "That's just my personal life, and I am not going to get into that at all.'

Nevertheless, Biden continued to make his faith - he is a "devout" Catholic in news reports – a key element of the campaign, as he has throughout his career. He also pledged to defend Roe v. Wade, to the point of codifying the decision into national law.

Catholic conservatives and liberals remain divided on how the church should respond, a tension demonstrated in a carefully worded statement by Los Angeles Archbishop Jose H. Gomez, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"The president-elect has given us reason to believe that his faith commitments will move him to support some good policies. This includes policies of immigration reform, refugees and the poor, and against racism, the death penalty and climate change," said Gomez, after the recent online USCCB

However, it is obvious that Biden's

Terry Mattingly

actions have clashed with "fundamental values that we hold dear as Catholics," the archbishop added. This includes supporting the federal funding of abortions, the return of the Health and Human Services contraceptive mandate and passage of the Equality Act, a sweeping LGBTQ rights bill that could lead to "unequal treatment of Catholic schools," said Gomez.

"We have long opposed these policies strongly. ... When politicians who profess the Catholic faith support them, there are additional problems. Among other things, it creates confusion among the faithful about what the Church actually teaches on these

Meanwhile, Pope Francis called to congratulate the president-elect.

What happens when Biden reaches the White House? That's a doctrinal, as well as political, question. The debate centers, in part, on a Catholic Catechism statement: "Formal cooperation in an abortion constitutes a grave offense."

'Grave" is a crucial term, since Catholic Canon Law states that those who are "obstinately persevering in manifest grave sin are not to be admitted to Holy Communion."

The current standoff has lingered since 2004, when Democrats nominated Sen. John Kerry, a Catholic liberal, for president. A committee of American bishops petitioned the Vatican for advice on the communion issue.

The committee's leader was Theodore McCarrick, the archbishop of Washington, D.C. The ex-cardinal has since fallen into disgrace in a sexabuse scandal involving teenaged boys and seminarians.

Then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger sent McCarrick a letter that was, at first, private. In it, the man who is now Pope Benedict XVI argued that if prominent supporters of abortion continue to present themselves for communion - against the advice of their local bishops – the "minister of Holy Communion must refuse to distribute it.'

McCarrick claimed - without releasing the text – that this letter endorsed compromise. McCarrick also said he believed it would be wrong to "turn the Eucharist into a perceived source of political combat."

Later, a public Ratzinger letter to the USCCB did appear to support a compromise approach.

Thus, McCarrick's gambit created a bitter standoff that continues to this day, with bishops on both sides quoting different letters by the now-retired pope.

The current Catholic leader in Washington, D.C., is Archbishop Wilton Gregory, who on Nov. 28th will become the first African American cardinal. He told Catholic News Service that Biden received communion during his years as vice president, and that "I'm not going to veer from that."

Gregory pledged to maintain a dialogue in which "we can discover areas where we can cooperate that reflect the social teachings of the church, knowing full well that there are some areas where we won't agree.'

Mattingly leads GetReligion.org and lives in Oak Ridge, Tenn. He is a senior fellow at the Overby Center at the University of Mississippi.

Indiana trailed 31-19 at the break and got no closer than 10 after the opening minute of the second half. The deficit ballooned past 20 points by midway through the second half on a frustrating afternoon, which included fourth-year coach Archie Miller getting whistled for a technical foul with 10:38 left.

The tournament is being played in the stints of roughly five minutes or longer North Carolina mountains instead of between baskets, including one of near- its traditional Hawaii setting due to the ly eight minutes that ended just before coronavirus pandemic.

Big picture

Texas: The Longhorns advanced past Davidson in the first round on Ramey's go-ahead drive with 20 seconds left, followed by two missed 3-pointers by Davidson for the win. The Longhorns hitting double figures after six Texas didn't have any such drama this time, scoring the first six points and never trailing while holding the Hoosiers to just five first-half field goals - a welcome sign after coach Shaka Smart talked about the need to see defensive improvement from Monday. The Longhorns advanced to Wednesday's championship game to face the North Carolina-Stanford winner.

Indiana: The Hoosiers overwhelmed Providence in the first round. That included getting a huge day from Race Thompson up front, with the 6-foot-8 forward posting 22 points and 13 rebounds for his first career double-double. But Thompson and the Hoosiers sputtered from the start in this one, missing 13 of 15 shots, then managing just one field goal for the final 8 1/2 minutes before halftime to dig themselves into a hole they would not erase. And Thompson finished with four points on 1-for-5 shooting. The Hoosiers will face the North Carolina-Stanford loser in Wednesday's third-place game.

Inconsistent play becomes Colts's key problem

By MICHAEL MAROT

Associated Press

Indianapo-INDIANAPOLIS lis Colts coach Frank Reich routinely warns players against riding the emotional waves.

His philosophy really has been put to the test this year.

Whether it's been COVID-19 curveballs; an early rash of debilitating injuries; the struggle to get players in sync because of a truncated offseason; or Monday's announcement that punter Rigoberto Sanchez is about to have surgery to remove a cancerous tumor, it's been tough.

Now, with five games remaining, the Colts need to focus on playing with more consistency.

"One thing we talked about in the locker room was when we play our style of football, when we play the way we know we can play, we've proven that we can stop anybody," Reich said after Sunday's 45-26 thrashing that gave Tennessee sole possession of the AFC South lead. "But just doing it for 30 minutes is not good enough. We have to do it for 60 minutes.

The Colts (7-4) simply have not excelled at being themselves.

Reich makes no secret of his desire to run first, a smart strategy given that he has one of the league's top offensive lines. But Indy ranks 22nd in yards rushing after finishing seventh last season, and its tied for 30th in yards per carry (3.7).

Statistically, the Colts' defense has been one of the league's best most of this season though lately it has only been at its best about half the time.

Three weeks ago, against Baltimore, it completely shut down reigning MVP Lamar Jackson – for a half. Then the Ravens played keep away and rallied for a 24-10 victory. the ground. In Week 11, it was the reverse. After the Packers took a 28-14 halftime lead, the Colts' staunch defense returned and nearly pitched a second-half shutout as Indy rallied for a 34-31 overtime win that appeared to affirm its status as a solid playoff team.

But it happened again Sunday when Derrick Henry ran for 140 yards and three TDs to stake Tennessee to a 35-14 halftime lead. Indy never recovered and it's left players and coaches frustrated.

"It seems like defensively we're coming out, we wait until we get hit in the mouth to start playing," Pro Bowl linebacker Darius Leonard said. "We can't do that. If we want to be a good team, we can't do that, and against a good team you definitely can't do that.'

And time is quickly running out for a team that has missed the playoffs four of the last five years. They need a solution,

We have to throw the first punch and we understand that," linebacker Anthony Walker said. "If we don't throw the first punch and we get hit in our mouth, and that continuously happens, then it needs to get corrected. That's something we need to fix.'

What's working

QB Philip Rivers. The 38-year-old quarterback is playing well. He's completing 67.3 percent of his throws, the third-highest percentage of his career. And in the last six games, he's thrown 12 TD passes, four interceptions and flirted with or topped the 300-yard mark four times.

What needs help The improvised run defense. How much difference can one player make? If it's DeForest Buckner, a lot. With the Pro Bowl defensive tackle, the Colts fared well against the league's top runners. In their first game without him, Indy gave up 229 yards and four TDs on WR T.Y. Hilton. Just when it seemed the four-time Pro Bowler was becoming an afterthought, he re-emerged Sunday with four catches for 81 yards and his first TD of the season. It could be the start of a big finish.

Stock down

TE Jack Doyle. The two-time Pro Bowler looked like he might be headed toward another big season in training camp - then Trey Burton made it back onto the field. Rivers threw only one pass in Doyle's direction Sunday and it was incomplete.

Injured

Sanchez delivered the news Monday on his Instagram post. Reich said the Colts are optimistic about Sanchez's recovery and return to football, though he didn't have a timetable. Reich said longtime left tackle Anthony Costanzo has a sprained medial collateral ligament in his knee and safety Khari Willis (back and quad) and running back Jordan Wilkins also are banged up. He wouldn't say if any of them would play this week. Reich also wouldn't say whether Buckner or DE Denico Autry would return from the reserve/COVID-19 list this week. He did say RB Jonathan Taylor was put on the list because he was considered a "close contact," making him eligible to return later this week.

Key number

6.6 - It wasn't just Henry's numbers 27 carries, 178 yards and three TDs that were problematic. His style was, too. He ran through and around defenders for 6.6 yards per carry.

Next steps With four losses, the Colts can't afford many more if they want to make the playoffs. It makes a win next weekend at Houston essential.
